Convincing a student that learning to edit his own papers is both possible and necessary, however, is a difficult task for a tutor, a task that requires persistent and consistent effort. Despite the difficulty, I believe that teaching students to become effective self-editors is absolutely vital to fulfilling the writing center’s mission of helping students become independent writers. The alternatives are unacceptable: providing a proofreading service, which creates the unhealthy dependency Carol Severino discusses in Chapter 5, or not providing the service at all.

Most tutors don’t need to be convinced that teaching ESL students to self-edit is a worthwhile goal; they simply aren’t sure how to go about it. Just as ESL students need to learn how to identify and correct errors, their tutors need to learn how to do so as well. This is more difficult than it seems because tutors will need resources beyond their native knowledge of English to carry out these tasks. When faced with a paper filled with grammatical and lexical mistakes, tutors need strategies for spotting patterns of recurring errors, pointing those patterns out to the student, and providing rules about how to correct those errors. In addition, tutors need to know which kinds of errors are most important to address. This chapter explores six types of major errors that ESL students and their tutors can correct together. While focusing on this limited set of errors will not enable students to produce error-free writing, this narrow focus will enable students to improve their writing. Most important, though, it provides a way to limit the focus in an ESL writer’s paper to certain types of errors. I find it important to note, however, that a tutor is not a grammar teacher. His ability to help is limited, as Paula Gillespie explores in Chapter 11; and yet, a tutor must master some knowledge of grammar in order to understand the six types of errors (see Chapter 14 on the need for tutors to learn more about the structure of English). Sometimes a tutor will find it necessary to refer a student elsewhere for more instruction, as will be discussed later in this chapter.

Before examining these issues in more depth, a summary of goals discussed so far might be helpful.

Goals for the Student

- Acknowledge the need to become a proficient self-editor.
- Learn what his most frequent patterns of error are.
- Learn how to recognize these errors.
- Learn how to correct these errors.

Goals for the Tutor

- Teach the student how to become a proficient self-editor.
- Learn how to identify frequent patterns of error.
- Learn how to correct (and teach students to correct) six major error types.
- Learn when to refer students elsewhere for more instruction.
Error-Correction Research

Some researchers note that while proofreading is usually against writing center policy, many students request this service, and some tutors do provide it. In one study, the authors suggest that writing centers should consider lifting the ban against proofreading. Research has shown, however, that direct error correction (crossing out errors and writing in corrections) does not prevent students from making the same errors in the next paper, nor does it seem to promote student learning. In addition, scholars generally agree with writing center pioneer Steven North: the overarching purpose of writing center tutoring is to “intervene in and ultimately alter the composing process of the writer,” that is, to improve students’ writing skills toward the goal of making them independent writers. Accordingly, most writing centers have a policy against tutors acting as proofreaders. Teaching students to become self-editors, then, is the tutor’s best alternative. At the same time, tutors will need to point out some types of errors that ESL students are not able to recognize on their own, as described in Chapter 2.

Dana Ferris has demonstrated a successful approach in teaching students to become effective self-editors through: (a) consciousness-raising about the importance of editing in general and of each particular student’s areas of need; (b) training in recognizing major error types; (c) teaching students to find and correct their own errors. ESL writing specialists agree that identifying errors should focus on those that are the most frequent, serious, and treatable. Serious errors are usually defined as those that interfere with communication; treatable errors, those that students can most readily learn to self-correct.

Clearly some students will evidence serious errors not included in the six error types presented in this chapter. When any error is interfering with communication, it should be addressed. Tutors should be aware, however, that some language features, such as prepositions, articles, and precise word usage, can take many years to learn; thus while such errors may be serious, they may need to be handled differently than other errors. This will vary depending on the student’s level and ability.

Six Error Types

Six error types that are treatable and are often frequent or serious in ESL college compositions follow:

1. subject-verb agreement
2. verb tense
3. verb form
4. singular/plural noun endings
5. word form
6. sentence structure

Subject-verb agreement errors occur when the subject does not agree with the verb in person or number. These errors can be as simple as He walk every morning or as complex as Every teenager knows how to choose clothes that flatters her figure.

Verb-tense errors occur when an incorrect time marker is used. For example: I was working on my paper since 6:00 am, or Even though this is my first day on the job, I have already found out that there were some difficult people here.

Verb-form errors occur when a verb is incorrectly formed, as we see in the following sentences. I will driven to the airport next week, and I was cook dinner last night when you called.

Singular and plural errors often occur when there is confusion about which nouns are countable and which aren’t. For example, I have turned in all my homeworks this week, and I set up six more desks for the afternoon class.

Verb form errors occur when the wrong part of speech is chosen: I’m happy to live in a democracy country, and I feel very confusing this morning.

Sentence structure errors refer to a broad range of errors that occur for a variety of reasons: a word (often a to be verb) is left out; an extra word (often a duplicate subject) is added; word order is incorrect; or clauses that don’t belong together are punctuated as one sentence. For errors like the following, asking the student for the intended meaning is key, as Minett explores in Chapter 6.

As a result of lack of moral values being taught by parents and the reemphasis by school many children have little respect for authority.

Note that sentence structure errors often contain other types of errors within them.

While these six error types are rule-based and thus treatable, it is important to note that the rules behind these errors are more complex than tutors may first believe. To deal with these errors effectively, tutors often need to know a good deal more about the grammatical structure of English than they often do, and unless they can explain the errors clearly and accurately to their ESL writers, it is advisable that they avoid grammatical concepts with which they are not familiar. This will quickly become apparent in line-by-line editing sessions. In addition, there are exceptions to every rule, exceptions for which ESL students will demand explanations. Because of this, effective tutors will need to study, discuss, and even debate grammatical rules together before they can provide this kind of help to ESL writers.

Tutor Resources

Successful tutoring sessions begin behind the scenes with the appropriate tutor resources and training. One resource every writing center needs is an ESL grammar handbook. If you can only choose one, I suggest Janet Lane and Ellen Lange’s Writing Clearly: An Editing Guide. A handbook and workbook look at your paper and point out what some of your most serious errors are. Then we'll review the rules behind those errors and correct your paper together. Is that OK?" Once they are in agreement on the procedure, Judy is ready to begin looking for Tang's patterns of error, focusing on the six error types previously outlined.
The ESL Tutoring Session

A paragraph from Tang's paper might look something like the example here.

Jackson applied for a job and was given an interview since he had all the necessary skills for the job; however he does [verb tense] not have the moral values such as respect other people or when not to use abusive language [sentence structure]. So during Jackson's interviewed [word form], he interrupted and used foul language toward his interviewers, and as a result he did not get the job. However, with the institute [word form] of moral values as part of the school academic [singular/plural], it will [sentence structure] improves [verb form] or built [verb form] on to the moral values each student already possessed [verb tense].

After marking the errors as shown here, Judy might ask Tang to read the paragraph aloud, correcting any mistakes he sees. Judy is quickly able to determine that words such as suck instead of such and the word order problem of a as result are typographical mistakes, but Tang is not able to correct any of his other errors. After glancing through the rest of his essay, Judy notices many more word form errors like these two, so she decides to focus on those first, marking them throughout the essay.

After Judy shows Tang his pattern of word form errors and reviews the Word Form Grammar Resource Sheet with him, they are ready to begin editing Tang's paper together. Judy points to the first error, reads it aloud, and asks Tang, "How can we correct this?"

during Jackson's interviewed

This point in the session is frequently one of the most difficult for the tutor because she must suppress her urge to give too much help. I suggest that tutors put down their pencils and wait patiently and silently for the student to give a response, prompting the student only when he cannot offer an alternative on his own. This is quite difficult, but very necessary. It is important for tutors to remember that an unhealthy dependence on the tutor will be formed if the tutor is too willing to supply the correct answers (see Chapter 5 for more on this).

A few moments of silence, Tang gives the answer interviewing, which of course is not quite right. Even still, Judy does not supply the correction. She directs Tang's attention back to the example and rule on the resource sheet and asks him to determine what part of speech the word should be (verb, noun, adjective, or adverb). On the second try, Tang gets it right: interview. Judy then asks Tang to write in the correction and double-checks to see that he wrote down his correct verbal answer. They proceed onward exactly this same way until all of the word form errors are successfully edited. If there is more time, Judy and Tang can move on to verb tense or verb form. After repeated sessions like these, the student can be led to recognize his own errors and correct many of them on his own. Editing sessions like the one portrayed here become the foundation on which students become proficient self-editors.

Granted, this method of editing is excruciatingly slow. In order to follow these suggestions, tutors will need to fight down their own sense of urgency. It is only natural to feel that too little is being accomplished in a session as slow-moving as this. Yet simply by marking a pattern of error and providing Tang with the information to correct those errors, Judy is providing a valuable service. By refraining from giving corrections, Judy affirms Tang's ownership of the paper, encouraging him to become a proficient self-editor. Tutors must be convinced of the benefits of this approach in order to implement these strategies. If a tutor is not sure that he is convinced, I suggest he discuss these ideas with a tutor trainer.

The scenario described here between Tang and Judy is a successful one. At times the session will be faster-moving because the student is already skilled at correcting his own errors once they are pointed out. But more frequently, a session can move even slower than the one described. A tutor might wonder how slow is too slow. What can a tutor do if, after waiting patiently between each guess and reviewing the rules several times, it becomes clear that the student is not able to correct his own work with the tutor's assistance? That is the time to bring out the ESL referral sheet and point the student toward a class or lab that can help her learn the skills she needs.

The tutor might say something like this, "It looks to me like you need to brush up on your English grammar before we can edit together. Here are some places where you can do that." Again, role-playing outside of the session can help tutors navigate difficult situations like this one. If the tutor is convinced that it would be unethical for him to correct the student's errors and that teaching ESL grammar exceeds his limitations, he will be confident in referring the student elsewhere. However, that doesn't mean the session has to end there. If the student is willing, the tutor can then refocus the session on rhetorical issues...

More often than not, however, tutors will find that their line-by-line editing sessions with students are successful. After the student has become aware of what his frequent patterns of error are, has learned the rules needed to correct those errors, and has become fairly proficient in correcting the errors his tutor marks for him, he is ready to begin finding errors on his own. An interim step toward that goal is for the tutor to be less direct in pointing out errors. In a future session between Judy and Tang, for example, Judy might say, "I see several word form errors in this paragraph. Can you find them?" If Tang has trouble finding them, Judy might say, "I see two on this line." If Tang still doesn't spot them, Judy could read that line out loud, exactly as it is written. Again, patient silence is needed while the student struggles to find the errors. Gradually, the student will become more proficient in finding his own errors; then he will be ready to learn how to proofread his own papers.

Clearly the student won't be able to proofread for every kind of error, so knowing her most frequent patterns of error is important. The tutor can ask the student to underline the types of words she has the most trouble with. For example, if the student has difficulty with subject-verb agreement, the tutor can ask the student to single-underline every subject and double-underline every verb, one paragraph at a time. This is something that can be practiced together during tutoring sessions until the student gains proficiency. Once the student has no trouble marking the frequent trouble spots in her paper, she is ready to start proofreading on her own, assisted by the grammar resource sheets she has already been working with. When a student reaches this stage of independence, her tutor should rejoice in the knowledge that she has played a big part in fulfilling the writing center's mission of helping students become proficient, independent writers.

Sample Word Form Grammar Resource Sheet

Explanation of the Error

Word form errors occur when the correct word is chosen but an incorrect form of the word is used. For example, in the sentence, Young people can be independence in the U.S.A., the noun form is used instead of the adjective form. The sentence should read, Young people can be independent in the U.S.A.

Most words in English have different forms for different parts of speech, but not all words have all forms. For example:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>noun</th>
<th>verb</th>
<th>adjective</th>
<th>adverb</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>independence</td>
<td>bath</td>
<td>independent</td>
<td>independently</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>bath</td>
<td>bathe</td>
<td>bathing</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>confusion</td>
<td>confuse</td>
<td>confusing</td>
<td>confusingly</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Some word forms look the same for different parts of speech. For instance, anger can be either a noun or a verb.

Some words have more than one form for the same part of speech. For example, bored and boring are both adjectives, but their meaning is different. The student is bored indicates that something outside the student is causing the boredom (such as the classroom lecture). The student is boring indicates that the student herself is causing the boredom (possibly by talking for too long).

Some word forms have a different meaning than expected. For instance, while to intimate is a verb form of intimacy, to intimate does not mean to become more intimate as might be expected. Instead it means to imply something, to hint at secret information. Consult a dictionary to be sure of word meanings.
Word endings often indicate part of speech. For example, words that end in -ly are usually adverbs. Quickly, slowly, and happily are all adverbs. Consult an ESL handbook or dictionary for more examples. Attentive reading is the best way to improve fluency with word forms.

Corrected Examples

The politician emphasized the need for more funding for education. (incorrect)
The politician emphasized the need for more funding for education. (correct)
In this example, the wrong part of speech is used.

My daughter independences daily. (incorrect)
My daughter becomes more independent daily. (correct)
Here, a nonexistent form is used.

I have two best friendships, Hung and Le. (incorrect)
I have two best friends, Hung and Le. (correct)
In this example, the correct part of speech (noun) was chosen. But friend has more than one noun form, and the wrong form was chosen.

Practice Sentences

I just finished decoration the house for Halloween.
I feel very healthily today.
Sue whispered quiet.
After reviewing my notes, I still feel confusing.
We helped raise funds to beauty our neighborhood.
